

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF THE WORKS OF WILLY LEY

compiled by Jean M. Perreault, Special Collections, U A H Library
(with the diligent assistance of Helen Tygielski)

Macrodocuments (treatises, histories, collections of essays, etc., the sort of things that cataloguers call 'monographs' as against periodicals, i.e., things that can be 'marked and parked' on the shelves as individual 'books'), whether by Ley alone or by him and other author(s), are shown (if U A H holds a copy) by a bold exclamation-mark in the left margin; if U A H does not hold a copy and no copy is available for examination, the marginal signal is a bold question-mark in the left margin; if U A H does not hold a copy but a copy has been found to examine, the marginal signal is a bold asterisk in the left margin. (U A H holdings of certain hard-to-find periodicals, notably Die Rakete and its successors, are shown by a small bold exclamation-mark in the left margin. Where a microdocument has not been examined and its existence is known simply from mention in another microdocument rather than in a more-or-less reliable secondary source, its uncertain status is shown by a small bold question-mark in the left margin.)

Macrodocuments not solely by Ley but containing more than one microdocument by him are filed by their macrodocument-titles, whereas a microdocument by Ley in its original publication (commonly as an article in a periodical) is filed by its microdocument-title but does not receive the marginal sign of ownership/availability. Macrodocuments by someone other than Ley, but which include a single microdocument by him, are filed by the title of the Ley-microdocument, not by that of the including macrodocument. Ownership of such microdocuments by U A H can usually be deduced from the completeness of the bibliographical information, since most secondary sources (from which bibliographical information about works not owned by U A H would be gathered) are all-too-commonly incomplete in some regard.

A microdocument with such a title as 'Introduction', 'Foreword', and the like, or where Ley's literary contribution to the macrodocument is in an editing or translating capacity, is filed on the title of its including macrodocument, with references from the included microdocument-title(s). To make filing location absolutely clear, the initial filing letter of each macrodocument-title is given in bold type.

A microdocument is normally listed only under its original language, i.e., not under both the original and the translated form. The normal form of an entry for a translated microdocument is thus Title. Language translated into, at least for the work's original appearance in such a macrodocument as a periodical; but if a microdocument is translated (either from English to German or vice versa) and published without explicit mention of the original title-form (from which can be appended either English or German), that translated form may be given, with the addition of 'begins...' and sometimes also 'ends...', which can eventually form the comparative basis for a decision as to the original. (Fortunately, such indecision as to title is seldom encountered in regard to macrodocuments.)

If a cased macrodocument ('book' -- or even a paperback) has been examined, its description includes pagination, height, color of boards and of lettering, and whether issued in dust-wrappers; otherwise, paperback, brochure, or paper cover is indicated. Series is stated, when known.

Literary detail is normally not restated for editions other than first, nor for translations of a work already described, but physical description (since it varies from item to item) is restated (if the item has been available for examination). Reliance is placed on secondary sources only if the item has not been examined. (Two of the most important secondary sources, Huebner and Ciancone, are shown with the bold numbers by which they list each macrodocument.) Some of the secondary sources, unfortunately, do not give complete bibliographical information (e.g., in showing dates of publication but not volume; in giving initial pagination only, rather than initial + terminal). Where the original publication-macrodocument (in most cases a periodical) are not available for examination, reliance upon such secondary sources results in incomplete information here -- but such original periodicals are often hard to obtain.

There are microdocuments which share almost-identical titles, and there are others which, in the absence of such shared titles, may indeed be the same literary entity. Wherever such confusions can be resolved, I do so, but I have no doubt that many remain unresolved (in many cases, probably, unnoticed). Readers of this list are requested to be of assistance to its compiler by either pointing such anomalies out, or (a fortiori) by communicating their resolution(s) to me. Further, there are cases (with both micro- and macrodocuments) where information not known can be tolerated even less than periodical-volume- or terminal-page information: in such cases there will occur either a bold “?” or a block of vertical strokes (||||); it can be hoped that information will be encountered that will allow for the filling of such lacunae.

Periodical-article data is given, for periodicals imprecisely dated/volumniated: 5:3, i.e., volume and page; for periodicals with both volumes and numbers: 5/4, i.e., volume and number. Dates are given in parentheses in the order: (1929.x.30), i.e., year . month . day (often, of course, with only year and month shown, sometimes only year). Periodical titles are given in their more-or-less full form except for Galaxy science fiction magazine (so frequent and so long), which is listed instead as merely Gal.

Lectures and announcements of newspaper articles, if not subsequently published (or at least not available for examination), are listed within “<...>”; information given includes the title of the lecture (sometimes less than reliably accurate, coming as it does from an ad, typically in a newspaper [prone as these are to being bibliographically accurate only to the extent that their copy-writers and editors see as enticing to the public]), the occasion(s) in chronological order, and typically the cautionary note “<not published?>”.
